

Josephine D. Laurente

I was broken down, built up again, and put in a whirlwind of emotions in my four years as a student in the Ateneo. I have held onto people and beliefs that made me carry on even during my darkest times. People believed in me, and so I strived to believe in myself too. At the end of the day, it is I who would direct my own future. I do not want to be trapped in someone else's dream. I am too young to let the world break me. I am yet to be the best version of myself.

MINOR IN ECONOMICS

The past four years have been a series of failed math tests, long meetings, overpriced coffees, and to-do lists that never seemed to end. College might have been like this, but it is also where I learned more about myself and my passion, where I met new friends and gained another family, and where I realized the value of commitment and of letting go. In the face of uncertainties or failures, this is where I learned to take risks and keep on dreaming, to remain thankful and hopeful.
