

Mary Janine A. Verocel

MINOR IN INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS

I have always been on the lookout for my happiness, and the happiness I can give to others. What these four years taught me is that it is not something you look for, but something you experience everyday and share with others. The past years were filled with both fun moments and undeniable hardships. With people whose hearts are filled with unconditional kindness and care, everyday, I am able to work towards the person I aspire to be — strong, kind and passionate. For that, I am most thankful.

Jose Lorenzo B. Villavert

MINOR IN FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT

Giving, supportive, and kind are a few words people would often describe me as. A genuine man for others as they would call it even though deep down, I know I have not embodied it fully. They say I was willing to go the extra mile to extend help and be there through breakdowns and rejections even to people I just met. Little do they know that I slowly became a better version of myself through them. I owe it all to them. I want to leave this question, do we really need a reason to help others?