College was one hell of a ride. Every year always had something new in store for me. Amidst all the sleepless nights, it was here in college, where I had many of my firsts. It was where I discovered so much about myself. I learned to take risks. I made lots of friends. Ultimately, I learned to put myself out there; to learn to be comfortable with feeling uncomfortable; to grab every opportunity available and to try new things every day. This is where life begins—at the end of your comfort zone.

My second home. Nothing worth having comes easy. The struggles, the happiness, the stress, the achievements. No matter what they say, we always pushed through. In these hallowed halls, I have met the best people in my life. I am forever thankful for those who surrounded me in this journey and gave the inspiration to always be better and to never go down without a fight. This chapter has come to an end and I can say that this was all worth it. I would do anything to relive those moments of bliss.
