"The theory of evolution claims that only the strong shall survive, but the theory of competition says, just because they're the strong, doesn't mean they can't get their asses kicked. What every long shot, come-from-behind, underdog will tell you is this: the other guy may in fact be the favorite. The odds may be stacked against you. But what the odds don't know is, this isn't a math test. This is a completely different kind of test. One where passion has a funny way of trumping logic." (Nike)

For God knows how long I have looked at the world through a magnifying glass. Every surface and crevice has appeared ugly to me, and I have done my best to express my discontent. However, the world is no better for any bit of my whining. It took me four years to crack my own shell. That familiar foulness is within me too. Being critical is such a nasty disposition, and it makes its claim on me now more than ever. That old looking glass is cracked, and I now face myself, discerning and hopeful.
