MINOR IN MARKETING

I started college as a lost soul, but I wasn't scared. It was a new phase of learning, growing, and living, and I was never alone. I found friends for life, and a new family to keep. These people made each and every minute in Ateneo worth it. They helped me discover my passions in life, but ultimately, through these people, I found myself. Now, I go down the hill into another new phase of my life, and luckily, I understand who I am and who I want to become.

Dear future self,
Remember the time you cried over your first Accounting test? Know that failure does not decide everything— it's an opportunity for you to learn something new. This is one of the most important realizations you had from college, so when you look back at those four (insane) years, be thankful for the experiences that have made you a stronger and more determined person.
Have fun, seize opportunities, and pursue your passion.
